by Michael GiacchinoAprotinin: a review of its properties and clinical applications.

Aprotinin is a non-specific inhibitor of lysosomal proteases, released from plasma after intravenous administration. This agent is being used in cardiac, orthopedic, obstetric and neurosurgical surgery as well as in combination with aspirin, ephedrine and acetylsalicylic acid in asthmatics to control postoperative airway obstruction and bronchospasm. Its mechanism of action is still not fully understood, but a pronounced antithrombotic effect is being linked with protease inhibition. Aprotinin, being a bovine product, may be potentially immunogenic. Hence, pharmacokinetic studies have been carried out to assess the therapeutic efficacy of the drug and to monitor its possible toxic effects. Serum levels of aprotinin have been assayed before and after surgery with the use of radioimmunoassay and an enzyme immunoassay. Aprotinin has not been found to cause haemorrhagic complications during abdominal operations, even though serum levels drop markedly in this setting. As several clinical studies have been carried out with aprotinin, we review them here. There is evidence that aprotinin
