One can see that there is no ambiguity in the definition here, and one can avoid any circularity by accepting the uncontentious premise that a state can be inconsistent. George: 'When a truth is given for granted, it must be true. And "accepted" is a decision, not a truth'. In the preceding post, I showed that your claim, that if the truth is accepted, it must be true, is false. George: 'Now, you can deny a true conclusion in order to avoid making a decision, but you cannot claim that making a decision is consistent with accepting a true conclusion'. This is a contradiction. Either the uncontentious premise that making a decision is consistent with accepting a true conclusion is true, or the uncontentious premise that making a decision is inconsistent with accepting a true conclusion is true. Marijuana appears to improve the accuracy and quality of patients' memories, as well as reduce the use of more aggressive medications and hospitalizations, according to a new study. Researchers from the University of Pittsburgh School of Medicine set out to determine the impact of medical marijuana on patients with a history of psychotic disorders and their clinicians. A single-center, observational and retrospective study enrolled 20 patients with schizophrenia-spectrum disorders who were at least 18 years of age and not using cannabis at the time of study and had been treated with antipsychotic agents for at least six months. "The three patients who scored positive for cannabis on the urine drug screen did not report any adverse effects or changes in their psychotic symptoms after cannabis was started," said study author Dr. Zhongtao Xie, a postdoctoral fellow in the Department of Psychiatry at the University of Pittsburgh School of Medicine, in a press release from the University of Pittsburgh School of Medicine. "Another patient came in to report one psychotic symptom when he was using cannabis." The study found that marijuana use resulted in a significant and sustained improvement in the overall cognitive symptoms, as measured by neurocognitive performance and daily life functioning, among patients with schizophrenia. The researchers found that the use of cannabis in their study cohort was associated with improvements in verbal memory, visual memory, working memory, and speed of processing. Additionally, a visual recognition memory task found that patients who used marijuana were more accurate than those who didn't use cannabis on this task. Patients who were heavy users of cannabis also showed the greatest improvement in cognitive function. "The improvement in cognitive symptoms and daily life functioning is encouraging and may have a positive impact in reducing patients' dependence on antipsychotic agents. Medical cannabis may provide a safe and effective way for patients with schizophrenia to control psychotic symptoms in the absence of severe side effects or dependence,"
